B. The conduct of scoret intelligence operations is highly technical procedure which should be entered upon only with a full realization of its complexities, a determination to maintain it only on a long term basis, and a disposition to make available all necessary facilities.

3. The secret intelligence organization should be devoid of responsibility for or direct participation in the formulation of foreign policy and should be equally free from political control or that of any single or exclusive group of policy forming agencies.

REPORT TO THE LOVETT COMMITTEE FROM THE STRATEGIC SERVICES UNIT

This report is really a set of documents which is of particular importance, not so much because it presents any new plan but because it lays out very clearly the historical and the theoretical reasons supporting the necessity of establishing a centralized intelligence service. By the time this report was submitted the central idea was no longer new. The reasoning behind it was, however, not always fully understood, and it has not elsewhere, to my knowledge, been stated so comprehensively.
